

FLAVOURS OF DESIRE E-BOOK ENGLISH

Ode to desire

by Swaane Lauwaert

MODULE 1: WELCOME!

The Menu of Desire: An Invitation to the Senses

Welcome. I am Swaane Lauwaert. I am so glad you're here. Because yes: this mini-course is for you alone, for you as a couple, or for any form of partnership where you want to feel that spark again. Take a moment to look around, or at your partner or partners if you're taking this course together. You've taken the first step, and that is often the hardest.

This mini-course, Flavors of Desire, is my personal ode to the return of appetite. Of "goesting." Perhaps you recognize it: you love your partner dearly, but the passion has been lost somewhere between diapers, work deadlines, or hormonal shifts. You communicate about the schedule, the fridge is full, but the nourishment for your soul is missing. Or perhaps you inhabit your body like a stranger right now—after childbirth, surgery, illness, or menopause.

I see you. I see the pain of the faded spark, the doubt about whether you're "still normal," and the exhaustion after trauma or illness. And I want to tell you one thing right away: you are not broken. You've simply lost your way to the menu of your own desire. And let's be clear: this is not a therapeutic course where we'll dig deep for hours. This is playtime. An invitation to let go of the rules of daily routine and make room for pleasure again.

My own journey began in the kitchen. As a chef, I learned that eating is all about the presence of all your senses. It's almost an erotic experience in itself: you smell the aromatic scent of fresh herbs, you taste the honey-sweet richness of a ripe fig, you feel the velvety texture of a raspberry on your tongue, and you hear the promising sizzle of the pan.

But we also know: under stress, you can't cook well, and you eat even worse. When our nervous system is on high alert, we swallow our food to fill up, not to feel. The flavor disappears. I am a chef, but I am also an intimacy and sex coach. To me, these two worlds are inseparable. Because those who can no longer taste at the table often can no longer fully feel in the bedroom.

The kitchen is one of the gateways to the bedroom. And the way we enjoy ourselves at the table tells us everything about how we dare to enjoy ourselves in bed. Sexuality is not an isolated island; it's an extension of how you experience your day. But it also carries the baggage you bring with you. It is interwoven with your history, the culture you were shaped in, and the stories you were told about sexuality—from your family or society. All those voices help determine how free you feel in your own skin.

But although that backpack can feel heavy, there is an entrance that goes beyond all those old stories. A place where we don't have to analyze, but only have to experience. And that is where sexuality transforms into eroticisme: the moment we make the switch from "surviving" to "experiencing." In this course, we are going to rediscover eroticisme via the shortest route: your senses. We are going to calm your nervous system. Because as long as you are in "survival mode," your body will never give permission for pleasure. We're going to hack your biology with tastes and scents, and we're going to bring back the playfulness.

I want to be very honest with you about what we're going to do here. I don't promise you a magic button that will immediately set your libido to 100%, but I do promise you a safe foundation in which desire can arise again. I promise you a blueprint to turn an ordinary evening into an erotic adventure, without the pressure that it "must" end in sex.

Let's start by debunking a big myth: libido is not an on-off switch. Libido is not a button. Desire needs a border, a structure, a foundation, just as a river needs a bed to flow. We are going to build that foundation together today. Eroticisme is the key here. Because as Esther Perel says: sex is a biological act, but eroticisme is the language of imagination. It's not about the touch itself, but about what that touch does to you.

And that is where the link with the kitchen is so powerful. A "mouthgasm"—that explosion of flavor when you taste that perfect combination of sweet, salty, and texture—instantly pulls you out of your head and into the now. It awakens your senses. And when those senses are awake, space is created for the imagination.

That sensory stimulation is the spark. From that spark, eroticisme arises: the playfulness, the tension, and ultimately that deep, almost spiritual connection where you truly meet not only each other's bodies, but each other's essence.

To create that foundation, that riverbed, we must understand what the "spark" needs. The spark needs lightness, playfulness, and not too much heaviness. We often make it too serious. But desire thrives on playfulness and—believe it or not—a little bit of risk. That's when you produce testosterone. And it awakens curiosity for the new. I'm not talking about dangerous behavior, but about stepping outside your comfort zone. If you stay within your familiar routine, it's cozy, like with friends, but that's not enough for the erotic spark. "Fire needs air," says Esther Perel. There must be room to crave again. This date night can be such a "risky" moment. It's stepping out of your comfort zone to break the routine and say: "Tonight, we're doing it differently." That slight discomfort is exactly what we need; it's the spark that rekindles curiosity for one another.

Today, we are going to take the pressure off completely. This mini-course is meant for one day, one evening: your date night. And my advice is: agree tonight that sex is off the table. That penetration is not on the menu. And that nothing "must" happen. After all, pressure is the ultimate sex killer. Consider this evening a first date where we dance on the edge of curiosity while guarding the peace and space. Agree on how far the other person can go, so that unconscious pressure falls away. You will notice that suddenly there is so much more to explore when the "destination" is scrapped. By removing the "destination > sex," the performance pressure disappears. You don't have to be afraid that a touch "has to mean something." You can just feel again.

The only thing required is your willingness. It starts with willingness—the readiness to sit at the table and see what happens. As Rosemary Basson describes it: you don't have to have a spontaneous hunger to enjoy. The appetite often only arrives with the first bite. "Feeling like it" doesn't always just drop from the sky. Sometimes you just have to start. We call that willingness. Think of it as a dinner you're actually too tired to go to, but as soon as you taste the first amuse-bouche and take in the atmosphere, you wake up. Your hunger is awakened by eating.

In this course, we are also going to discover what your "accelerators" are and where your "brakes" are, so you can learn again what you truly enjoy. You can see your desire as a fire in a stone oven: to keep it burning, you need oxygen and fuel—your accelerators. These are the scents, the atmosphere, the soft touch, or that one look that invites you to taste. But a fire goes out if there is too much ash on it or if the air supply is cut off by stress, fatigue, or a head still full of the day's to-do list. Those are your brakes.

Sometimes we unconsciously slam on the brakes with full force while wondering why we're not moving forward. During Flavors of Desire, we don't learn to push harder, but to gently release the brake. We investigate what blocks you and what specifically makes you flourish. We create a safe space where heaviness can give way to light-footedness. Because only when you know what is blocking your brakes can room be made for the playfulness of the spark. Then it's no longer about "having to," but about rediscovering what makes you warm inside.

Your moment of deepening for today:
Take the time to explore the downloads for this module. See it as a first introduction to the blueprint of yourself and that of the other(s). This is an opportunity to taste in peace what these insights mean for you personally, but also for the dynamics within your relationship or partnerships. Use them as ingredients at your shared table—whether that is with one partner or within a broader web of connections. Discover not only your own desire but also learn to understand what rekindles the inner fire in the other. It is an invitation to learn to speak each other's unique language, to respect each other's "brakes," and to see what truly makes you glow.

Playing solo? View this exercise as an intimate dinner with yourself. Use the blueprint to deepen the relationship with your own body and desire. It's about learning to speak your own "language" and discovering how to create a foundation, a bed if you wish for yourself in which your fire can flare up, without needing anyone else for that. You are your own most important partner; treat yourself to the curiosity you would normally give to another.

First, we have The Intimacy Blueprints Quiz a very fun and revealing part:
See it as a way to discover which "dish" is actually standard on your menu. Are you a Sensual type, who first needs the atmosphere, the music, and the soft lighting to truly sit at the table? Or do you go more for the raw energy and power of the Sexual?
We also look at the insights of Emily Nagoski. You'll discover if your desire is spontaneous or responsive. In other words: do you wait until your stomach starts growling on its own? Or do you notice that you only get hungry the moment you smell the delicious scents from the kitchen and see the first amuse-bouche?

Next, we have The Shopping List.
Don't worry, we're not just going to do whatever. You're going to get the specific ingredients for the dish we're going to make together. They are the building blocks needed to shape your desire.

And finally: The Prep-Checklist.
Before we go into the kitchen, we prepare the foundation, the riverbed. Ask yourself the questions: what do I need to truly relax? Which brakes can be released? And which senses do I experience most intensely right now? Is it touch, smell, or perhaps sight?

An important note for those taking this journey with a partner—or multiple partners:
See the quiz and these questionnaires as your joint preparation. It is essential that you discuss the results of the Blueprints and the answers to the Prep-Checklist in detail with each other before the actual date night begins. By laying your menus side by side beforehand and understanding each other's ingredients, you create the safety and curiosity needed. That way, you know exactly what's on the other person's menu and where the spark gets room to grow, even before the first candle is lit.

Sometimes we unconsciously slam on the brakes with full force while wondering why we're not moving forward. During Flavors of Desire, we don't learn to push harder, but to gently release the brake. We investigate what blocks you and what specifically makes you flourish. We create a safe space where heaviness can give way to light-footedness. Because only when you know what is blocking your brakes can room be made for the playfulness of the spark. Then it's no longer about "having to," but about rediscovering what makes you warm inside.

Your moment of deepening for today:

Take the time to explore the downloads for this module. See it as a first introduction to the blueprint of yourself and that of the other(s). This is an opportunity to taste in peace what these insights mean for you personally, but also for the dynamics within your relationship or partnerships. Use them as ingredients at your shared table—whether that is with one partner or within a broader web of connections. Discover not only your own desire but also learn to understand what rekindles the inner fire in the other. It is an invitation to learn to speak each other's unique language, to respect each other's "brakes," and to see what truly makes you glow.

Playing solo? View this exercise as an intimate dinner with yourself. Use the blueprint to deepen the relationship with your own body and desire. It's about learning to speak your own "language" and discovering how to create a foundation, a bed if you wish for yourself in which your fire can flare up, without needing anyone else for that. You are your own most important partner; treat yourself to the curiosity you would normally give to another.

First, we have The Intimacy Blueprints Quiz a very fun and revealing part:
See it as a way to discover which "dish" is actually standard on your menu. Are you a Sensual type, who first needs the atmosphere, the music, and the soft lighting to truly sit at the table? Or do you go more for the raw energy and power of the Sexual?
We also look at the insights of Emily Nagoski. You'll discover if your desire is spontaneous or responsive. In other words: do you wait until your stomach starts growling on its own? Or do you notice that you only get hungry the moment you smell the delicious scents from the kitchen and see the first amuse-bouche?

Next, we have The Shopping List.
Don't worry, we're not just going to do whatever. You're going to get the specific ingredients for the dish we're going to make together. They are the building blocks needed to shape your desire.

And finally: The Prep-Checklist.
Before we go into the kitchen, we prepare the foundation, the riverbed. Ask yourself the questions: what do I need to truly relax? Which brakes can be released? And which senses do I experience most intensely right now? Is it touch, smell, or perhaps sight?

An important note for those taking this journey with a partner—or multiple partners:
See the quiz and these questionnaires as your joint preparation. It is essential that you discuss the results of the Blueprints and the answers to the Prep-Checklist in detail with each other before the actual date night begins. By laying your menus side by side beforehand and understanding each other's ingredients, you create the safety and curiosity needed. That way, you know exactly what's on the other person's menu and where the spark gets room to grow, even before the first candle is lit.

If you are doing this curse on your own: Then this is the moment for an intimate date with yourself. Take the time to truly let your own blueprint and the answers to the checklist sink in. Think of it as writing your own personal menu. By understanding beforehand which ingredients make you sparkle and which brakes you can release, you create the safety to fully enjoy yourself later. That way, you know exactly how to set the atmosphere for yourself in which your own spark gets all the room, even before you light the first candle for yourself.

Now that we've studied the map and gathered the ingredients, it's time to leave the theory behind. We're going from knowing to feeling, from understanding to experiencing. Because as beautiful as the blueprints are, the real magic only happens when the flame goes under the pan and the aromas fill the room. The preparation is done, the structure of the landscape is laid, and the curiosity is awakened.

Step out of your head, let go of thoughts about "how it should be," and come to the kitchen.
The table is set,
the lights are dimmed,
and the atmosphere is just right.
Let's play.

I'll see you in the next video, in Module 2.

MODULE 2: PREPARATION

Mise-en-place of Eroticisme: Purifying your Kitchen Temple

Welcome to Module 2. In the culinary world, mise-en-place is sacred. It means: everything in its place. A chef cannot create in chaos. For your date night, the same applies. We are going to transform your kitchen from a place of "chores" and dishes into a kitchen temple. Look at your counter. Are there still unopened letters? Are the dishes still there? Clear it up. Clutter is a "brake"—a brake on your desire. A clean space gives your nervous system the signal that it is safe to relax. Creating a ritual space is done with intention. As Esther Perel says: "Playing with desire is a form of ritual." By dimming the lights, putting on music, and paying attention to hygiene and atmosphere, you communicate to yourself and your partner the importance of what is about to happen. It lifts the evening above the everyday. Whether you're sitting at a table or on a picnic blanket on the floor: the kitchen is now hallowed ground.

Why do we do this so extensively? Because statistics teach us something crucial about our biology: the majority of women—and actually anyone with a more "responsive" nervous system—needs an average of 45 minutes to flip the switch. That is not a shortcoming; that is how we function. It is the time your nervous system needs to initiate the landing. Whether you do this course solo, with a man, or as a woman with a woman: those 45 minutes are your runway from stress to sensuality. The mise-en-place is therefore not just for the kitchen; it is the time you grant yourself to leave the day behind and arrive in your own body.

Mise-en-place is your ally during that time. While you wash the fruit, toast the almonds, and let the wine breathe, you are already "preheating" your body. Because stress and desire cannot coexist: when your cortisol (stress hormone) is high, your dopamine and testosterone—the fuels of desire—plummet. By shedding the logistical ballast of the day and stimulating your senses with the scent of fresh flowers or a burning fireplace, you force your nervous system into "reception mode."

A good chef always tastes in his head first. Flavor is in the imagination, not just on the tongue. We call that Positive Anticipation. Desire is "wanting to have" what is not yet there. Use the preparation to fantasize. How will your partner smell? What are you going to feel later? Who do you want to be tonight? A graceful goddess, a voluptuous temptress, a rugged workman, or just a version of yourself that parks all shame for a moment?

The preparation begins with both of you, separate from each other but still connected. Let the day slide off you. Take a warm bath with herbs or a long, conscious shower. Rub your skin with oil; feel the touch of your own hands and the scent of cedarwood or soft flowers. Put on something in which you feel beautiful and powerful—whether that's a silk dress, linen pants, or just a soft bathrobe on your bare skin. Put the phones away and leave the outside world at the door.

And start playing already. Move your hips to the music. By moving your pelvis, you activate the flow in your body and clear the way for the energy stored there. Stimulate yourself with your thoughts. Think back to how you met your partner. That first look. That first kiss. That first time you discovered each other's skin. Let the butterflies in your stomach and your clammy hands be there again; they are the signposts to the desire that has simply been waiting for you all this time.

And are you doing this solo? Then use the power of your own erotic archive. Think back to a moment when you felt irresistible. A look from a stranger that made you glow, the memory of that one touch that made your breath hitch, or even a fantasy about someone you don't know yet. Let those images slide through your head while you sniff the scents in the kitchen. You are your own muse; let your own imagination show you the way to that tingling feeling in your body.
Now that you know your Blueprint from the previous module, you can set up your temple accordingly:

Energetic: Need more space and atmosphere? Set out extra candles.
Sensual: Focus on textures. Lay out a soft blanket or ensure silky ingredients.
Sexual: Seek direct contact. Use your hands during preparation, make eye contact with your partner.
Kink: Play with surrender. Lay the blindfold ready on the counter.
Shapeshifter: Mix and match. Let yourself be surprised by what arises.

Don't forget: a spark needs playfulness. Keep it light. If we stay within our comfort zone, it's cozy, but for the erotic spark, we must break the routine. That slight discomfort of "doing it differently" generates the testosterone we need for arousal. Be gentle with each other. Touch your partner's back for a moment, whisper something in his or her ear. Whether you're solo or together: be grateful for this moment. Let your mouth water for what is to come.

My invitation for now:
Finish your mise-en-place.
Ensure all ingredients are ready so you don't have to run later.
Phones off.

The temple is open.
See you in the next module, where we begin with a ritual.

MODULE 3: CREATING THE RIVERBED

Mise-en-place of Eroticisme: Purifying your Kitchen Temple

Welcome to Module 3. We have arrived at the "Slow Roast phase." In the kitchen, we know: the best flavors arise when you take your time. A slow roast cannot be rushed. The same applies to desire. Step out of your daily roles now. You are not a parent, an employee, or a planner anymore. You are a sensory being. Your body is your kitchen, and it must be warm to be able to soften.

Perhaps you think you need a "perfect body" or a luxury hotel room to feel the spark, but that is a myth. Your sensory presence is much more powerful than the perfect setting. You simply cannot cook in an ice-cold kitchen. Your body needs warmth to soften. Whether you've come out of a warm bath, rubbed your skin with scented oil, or chosen clothing that feels sensual: feel how you soften. Dress like a queen, like a Venus stepping out of her shell. And for the men or the masculine energy in the relationship: step forward like a viking, or a king. Dare to think outside the box. We all have those masculine and feminine forces within us; play with them. Don't be afraid to be "too much." In this space, you are allowed to play with who you are. Forget "perfection"; you are here to feel, not to be judged.

Remember the "No Sex" rule: it remains in effect. That takes away the pressure and creates space for the tease. We are now going to make the first connection through the eyes. Pour a glass together. Whether it's wine, a fragrant tea, or ceremonial cacao: listen to the sound of the liquid filling the silence. And then there is only one rule: look each other deep and uninterruptedly in the eyes during the very first sip. Hold this for at least 30 seconds.

Feel how the liquid touches your lips. Your mouth opening and receiving. How the drink caresses your tongue. Let the liquid swirl in your mouth and taste every nuance. Feel how, after you swallow, it slowly descends into your stomach. Close to your heart. Let the world around you fade until only that look remains. Feel how your heartbeats synchronize and the focus shifts from the busy outside world to your intimate inner world.

Solo? Look at yourself in the mirror. Look yourself deep in the eyes and acknowledge the beautiful woman standing there. Devour yourself with your eyes.
Put perfectionism and shame out the door. Let playfulness, laughter, and fantasy in.

Remember those 45 minutes of warming up and also: You don't have to "perform" anything yet. Touch your partner's back, give a hug—feel how the oxytocine, the cuddle hormone, begins to flow. Be gentle and kind to the other and to yourself. The erotic landscape is so much larger than just the sexual act. As Esther Perel says: "Eroticisme is the language of imagination." It is the poetry of the body. It's not about the touch itself, but about what that touch means. It is the ceremony of seduction.
My invitation for now: Stay in this deceleration.
Enjoy your drink,
enjoy the look of the other.
Let the hunger slowly arise.

In the next module, we finally go into the kitchen to truly taste.

MODULE 4a SENSORY REVOLUTION

Dancing with textures in full surrender

Welcome to module 4. When you stimulate your senses, something fascinating happens: you shift from your survival mode—thinking, arranging, stress—to your experience mode. This is the only state in which the spark of desire can jump across. Why does this work?

First: we calm the vagus nerve. By consciously tasting and smelling, you slow down your heart rate. Your body gets the signal that it is safe, and safety is the nursery of desire.

Second: we activate dopamine through anticipation. Hearing a cork pop, seeing a beautifully set table; these are the "accelerators" that tell your brain: "I want more."

Third: we pause the "chatterbox" in your head. You cannot deeply enjoy the texture of an oyster and simultaneously worry about your tax return. The connection between your head and your pelvis is restored. You become embodied again.

And finally: we sensitize your skin. By consciously touching textures in the kitchen—the roughness of a meringue, the smoothness of whipped cream—you sharpen your sensory "receiver." A touch you would normally hardly notice now comes in as an erotic stimulus.

We begin at the base of this ritual: the conscious touch. Stand behind each other at the sink, the back of one against the chest of the other. Feel your partner's breath against your back or the warmth of the chest against your shoulders. Turn on the faucet and let the warm water flow over both your hands. Take your time. Wash each other's hands with slow, almost fluid movements. This is not a hygienic act; it is a transfer. Feel the lines in the palms, the curve of the fingers, and the velvety skin between the fingertips. Massage the mound of the hand, where we unconsciously hold the day's tension.

Did you know that 20 seconds of this skin-on-skin contact immediately lowers your cortisol? This ritual literally washes the "workday" and all the roles you play outside this kitchen off your skin. You see the water disappear into the drain, and with it, the ballast. In this warm water, the transformation takes place: the manager and the planner dissolve, and the lovers remain. You are now purified and ready to speak the language of the body.

Then bring your hands to the other's face. Close your eyes and let your partner inhale deep, very deep between your fingers. Now take a fresh herb or an aroma. In the kitchen, we know: herbs must be bruised to fully release their hidden aroma, to lay bare their soul—and exactly the same applies to us. Sometimes we have to slow down, apply deep pressure, and break the resistance to be truly present. Feel how you rub the leaf between your fingers, the texture changing, the essence being released.

Let the scent enter your limbic system—where memory and desire live. Close your eyes and ask yourself: what memory does this evoke? What far-off place or moment of happiness comes up? Share it with each other. Whisper it: what is your favorite scent? Is it the scent of fresh rain on warm asphalt, the familiar neck of a loved one, or this bruised leaf? Let the scent be the bridge to each other's inner world. Feel the tingle as the aroma mixes with the natural scent of your skin. You are no longer just in the kitchen; you have arrived in the garden of your own senses.

MODULE 4b: RECIPE
'1001 nachten'

Ingredients

- Meringue: 4 large store-bought meringue nests (or 1 large base, approx. 5 oz).
- Fresh berries: 1/2 cup (raspberries, red currants, blueberries, and pomegranate seeds).
- Heavy cream: 3.5 fl oz (chilled).
- Sour cream: 2.5 fl oz.
- Slivered almonds: 1 tbsp (toasted).
- Lemon zest: From 1/2 an organic lemon, finely grated (for finishing).
- Rose water: 1/2 tsp.
- Garnish: Fresh mint leaves and optional kumquats.
-

Preparation

1. Whip the cream: In a chilled bowl, whip the heavy cream until stiff peaks form. Do not add any sugar.
2. Flavor the sour cream: In a separate small bowl, gently stir the rose water into the sour cream.
3. Assemble: Spread the whipped cream over the meringue nests. Then, spoon the flavored sour cream on top.
4. Garnish: Scatter the berries over the cream like fallen jewels. Add the sliced kumquats if you are using them.
5. Finishing touch: Sprinkle the fine lemon zest over the top for a fresh zing. Finish with the toasted slivered almonds and fresh mint leaves.

USE YOUR HANDS, PLAY, AND LICK YOUR FINGERS!!!

The Ritual

- The Touch: "Take the meringue in your hands and feel its fragility—the dry, cool essence of the sugar work."
- The Sound: "Let the meringue slowly crack beneath your fingers; listen to the sound of resistance breaking."
- The Texture: "Spoon the whipped cream slowly, like silky, liquid satin, over the shards of the meringue."
- The Synergy: "Work hand in hand, as one organism; while one person spoons the cream, the other scatters the berries like glistening rubies over the white."
- The Scent: "Bruise the mint leaves..."

MODULE 4c: Mouthgasm: the dance of giving and receiving

Now we slowly glide toward the step of total surrender. Feel the soft fabric of the blindfold as you tie it around the other's head, or let yourself be shrouded in darkness. It is a sacred act: switching off the sight to throw the gates to the rest of your body wide open. The eye wants its share, but the blind taste more. The moment the light disappears, something magical happens in your nervous system. Your other senses sharpen by 400%. The smallest breeze on your skin becomes a caress, the softest whisper a touch. You are no longer a spectator of the evening; you become the experience itself. In that deep, velvet darkness, there is no more judgment, no mirror looking on. There is only the vibration of sound, the warmth of proximity, and the absolute, sizzling focus on what is to come. You hand over control to fall into ecstasy.

Feed the other with your fingers. Bring your hand to the other's lips. Use no cutlery; only the warmth of your own fingers. Feel the fragile meringue between your fingertips before gently pushing it against that waiting mouth. Feel how the sugar begins to melt on the moist warmth of the tongue, how the glaze slowly dissolves. Then take a berry, full and tense with juice. Let it gently burst against the other's lips, a small explosion of freshness that cuts through the darkness of the blindfold. This is a mouthgasm in slow-motion, born from total, undivided focus. Savoring is the art of slowing down with every bite. Dare to play with the unexpected, the extremes that wake up the brain.

Place a single, coarse grain of sea salt on a cloud of unsweetened cream, bitter chocolate with a slice of kumquat. It is the exquisite tension between sweet and salty, the dance between the distance we keep and the proximity we crave. Salt is the key; it opens the gates of your taste buds that normally stay closed. It forces a direct endorphin shot into your body. Don't eat to nourish, but taste to meet.

And then, add your voice as the most intimate ingredient. Lean forward until you feel the other's warmth, and whisper directly into the ear. Gently blow where the skin is most sensitive. The neck, the chest, the upper arm. Whisper to the other what they are being fed: "Can you feel the sun still trapped in this strawberry? Your skin is as soft as this cream..." Let the vibration of your voice slide over their neck like a caress. Ask the other to describe what he or she tastes. How that feels in the mouth. What they smell. How they experience the whispering and breathing. And then, in that moment of trust, dare to speak out to each other what you desire now: "I would find it even more delicious if you kiss me in the neck now, caress the inside of my thigh."

And also for the solo experience: add your own voice as the most intimate ingredient. Close your eyes, bring your own hand to your neck or place it on your chest, and whisper your words out loud to yourself. Let the vibration of your voice resonate through your own body. Tell yourself what you taste and experience: "I feel the tingle on the tongue from the kumquat... my skin is as soft as this fruit." Dare to speak out what you truly desire at this moment. Say it out loud, without shame: "I would love it if I now..." Acknowledge your own need and let the sound of your desire fill the room. You are the queen or king of your own senses here.

Then switch roles: dare to give and dare to receive without guilt.

When everyone has feasted on this recipe, the blindfold slowly slides off. Let your eyes adjust to the flickering candlelight, to the contours of the body before you, which now seems even more beautiful through the hunger of your other senses. At this point, the food leaves the plate. Switch roles now in this sensory game; let one be the giver and the other the receiver, then slowly reverse the roles.

Watch how the honey flows slowly from the spoon, a shining, golden thread heavy with gravity. Let a single drop fall exactly where the lips open. Or draw with utmost precision a slow, white trail of cool cream over the warm skin of a neck, a wrist, or the hollow of a collarbone. Follow that trail now with your tongue. Feel the contrast between the cool, silky texture and the sizzling warmth of the skin waiting underneath.
Switch turns and feel how the roles shift: from the one who tastes to the one being tasted. The boundary between what nourishes us and what we crave now completely blurs. It is no longer clear where the taste ends and the touch begins. You don't just taste the ingredient; you taste the essence of the other. Everything we've built tonight—the ritual, the scent, the deceleration—comes together here in one fluid movement of pure surrender.

And for the solo player: Today you are both the chef and the gourmet. Take the time to seduce yourself. Look in the mirror at how the honey slides from the spoon and feel how that golden drop lands on your own lips. Draw that trail of cream over your own neck and follow the sensation with your fingertips or your tongue. This is not a hasty meal; this is an homage to your own body. Whisper to yourself what you feel, what you taste, and what you desire. Because when you learn to enjoy yourself with surrender, you become invincible in your own sensuality. You are the source of your own fire.

Let the shame disappear. Let pleasure touch you in the deepest parts of your being. And remember: we do not proceed to sex or self-pleasuring. Hunger is the best sauce. Hold that tension. Let the desire flow, but save the release for later.
Enjoy "wanting to have" what is not yet there.

MODULE 5: The sweetness of intimacy & savoring the afterglow

Welcome to module 5. We end where we began: with utmost tenderness. The storm of the senses subsides and makes way for a deep, warm presence. This is the afterglow. Take a warm, moist cloth. Clean the mouth and hands of the other with extreme slowness. Feel the peace in your movements. This final gesture of care is the soft bridge from the kitchen to the rest of your night. It is a ritual of gratitude. Gratitude is not just a politeness; it is an essential medicine for your well-being. It tells your nervous system that the experience was "safe" and "valuable," allowing the memory to anchor itself deep in your cells.

Solo? Cleanse yourself with the same tenderness. Be grateful for your own body, which is capable of receiving all this pleasure.

Now take the other's hand. Use your fingertip to very slowly write a single word in your partner's palm. A word that describes what you feel for them at this moment. Perhaps it is "Close," "Hunger," "Soft," or "Seen." Express the word not only in letters but in the intention of your touch. Let the other guess, or simply let the word hang between you as a secret. This is the anchoring of the new connection you have forged tonight.

Doing this ritual solo? Then place your own palm against your heart or write the word very slowly on your own forearm. Choose a word that describes what you grant yourself after this evening. Perhaps it is "Freedom," "Sensuality," or "Coming Home." Feel your own fingertip slide over your skin; the touch of the person who will always be there for you: yourself. Anchor this feeling of self-worth and pleasure deep in your own body.

I want to share something important with you. Perhaps you bring baggage with you. Perhaps you are in transition, a phase where your body reacts differently than you were used to. Or perhaps there is old trauma that sometimes uninvitedly walks into the kitchen. Be kind. Your body is not a machine you have to "turn on" with a button. It is a temple that sometimes needs more time to open the doors. The senses are precisely the way back home in these phases. By focusing on the roughness of the salt or the warmth of the cream, you lead your nervous system past the fear and the shame. Your senses do not judge; they only experience.

The kitchen is now again a silent witness to your journey. The lights remain dimmed, the taste of rose water and honey still hangs in the air. Take this feeling of full enjoyment—the savoring—with you into the rest of your evening. Stay in the slowing down. Stay in the connection.

If you feel you are stuck somewhere, or you long for more depth in this process, contact me or take a look at the Eros Sanctuary, where we dive even deeper together into the language of the body.

Thank you for allowing me into your kitchen temple.
Enjoy the afterglow.
Enjoy yourself.
Enjoy each other.

wwww.swaanelauwaert.com
© 2026 Swaane Lauwaert. Alle rechten voorbehouden.