THE EROS SANCTUARY MODULE 4

Can you relate to this?
Everything is going smoothly, and suddenly, this wave of anxiety or self-doubt hits you. Or you feel your excitement building up, and all of a sudden, your body just shuts down again?
This is what Gay Hendricks calls the 'upper limiting' problem. Our ego has this built-in thermostat for happiness: the moment life starts feeling 'too good,' we unconsciously create a problem or a distraction. It's a survival mechanism to pull us back down to a 'safe,' familiar level of mediocrity, simply because our nervous system can't carry that positive energy just yet.
To turn up that thermostat—and to gently get our nervous system used to 'more'—we're working with titration this week, which is also called 'the pendulum.' Instead of forcing yourself to stay in that pleasure and shutting down, you softly pendulum back and forth between a neutral spot and a feel-good sensation. Think of it as dripping an experience in, drop by drop. With these daily micro-doses of ease and pleasure, we're building trust step by step. We're expanding your nervous system's capacity for joy and delight—little by little.

DAILY MICRO-DOSES OF BLISS.

Your invitation for this week is to practice with 'a little more pleasure' during your normal, everyday tasks. You do this by very consciously shifting your attention between different physiological sensations:

INSTRUCTIONS:

1. Notice a neutral sensation (for example: the feel of the steering wheel in your hands, the texture of the towel while doing the dishes, the pressure of your feet on the hard kitchen floor, or the physical contact between your lower back and the back of your chair).

2. Shift your attention to a pleasurable sensation (for example: a kiss from your partner or child, a hug from your pet, the rich taste of your first sip of coffee, the warmth of the shower water, listening to a beautiful song, or gratitude for something magical that happened this week).

3. Expand the container: Stay with that good feeling and see if you can hold onto the pleasure for just 5 seconds longer than you normally would.

4. Pendulum back to neutral: Before your mind distracting you or your body tightening up, gently shift your attention back to your neutral anchor (like the steering wheel or your feet on the floor). Take a breath there, and feel that it is safe to return.